Birds build nests.

I don't know when it all started, the bird quietly built a nest in the bougainvillea tree in my house. I looked up and saw that the nest had been built, but there was no sign of the bird.

I am very interested in the bird's nest, I look up every day, can't help but marvel at the ability of birds to build nests. Pieces of dried leaves are picked up by birds, and then supported by dried twigs, and then they can start living in it. Dried leaves are so light that they can be blown away by the wind. I'm curious, how did the bird make the first piece of leave withstand the wind?

I love woodworking, but I'm always short of tools. I am very envious to see that birds can build a house without a nail or a rope.

The spot where birds choose to build their nest is carefully chosen: this bird chose the bougainvillea because of its sturdy branches. In addition to that, among the many branches, it will choose the one with leaves to avoid the harsh sunlight.

When birds grow up, they fly away and leave the nest. I'm going to take it down and put some soil and fern in it, that'll be the most beautiful and original flower pot.
